boredom waiting for him to graduate.

"Besides, it's important for me to advance with him intellectually, and I've been thinking of studying law later on," she said.

Miss Scott, 19, also is interested in future law studies if she can first get a government degree at U. Va.

A Charlottesville resident, she became Lowe's secretary after attending the College of William and Mary for a semester.

Unable to return there, she decided to fight the anti-women rules "more on principle than anything else since I thought my rights had been discriminated against because of my sex . . . After I got the bureaucratic runaround and the flat nose from the university, I felt even more committed to do something about it."
